They launched their online start-up in mid-February to inject a refreshing, new perspective into the fashion industry. "What we do is very much a reflection of who we are," Charters said. "We're in the business of fashion — we just don't call ourselves that." FHM was founded in 1998 when Charters, who had worked as a copywriter at J. Walter Thompson and founded Broadcol, a direct-response advertising company, began selling dresses online out of her house. She teamed up with fashion designer Matthew Rosen, also the son of a successful textile businessman, to make the transition to online retailing. Why do something different? Because the fashion business is being forced to change. Rosen explained that over the past 30 years, the business model was to have stores owned by manufacturers on the one hand and a distribution system on the other. The result was an industry that was ultimately controlled by and for the top 1% of society and had a very limited selection of clothes for all of the rest of society to choose from. Rosen said, "It was the epitome of a two-tier culture — a top tier of buyers and sellers who buy from each other." The pair started to look for a way to put the industry on a more democratic basis. Rosen said he spent 10 years looking at businesses that did other things online but were extremely clunky and difficult to use. Rosen ended up in business with the founders of HSN, Inc., a home shopping company. That was when he found his solution. "It was very simple," he said. "We came up with a platform that was based on demographics and fashion style." FHM has three main sections: the lifestyle site, the "Made to Measure" section, where women can have their clothing tailored to their size and style, and the FHM boutiques where fashionistas can go to buy and pick up merchandise at a price they can afford. Charters explained that only about 1% of Americans have the money to spend on the sort of exclusive labels that most people would recognize, but they still want to look like those people.
