I used to own Photoshop and use PhotoShop diligently until Adobe decided to make it free. Since then I have began to use more of the features in Elements such as the cloud feature. Now I am experiencing a few things I did not use before. One of the nicest things is the online gallery. Since I have all my photos in the cloud I can click on any of my website and the image will open and be able to save. The other nice thing is that I can download large amounts of images to my hard drive. This is very helpful when working with large groups of images. There is also a cloud service called Adobe Presenter which I use to make presentations of photo collages. It is very easy to upload your presentation, make it interactive, and then use tools to make your presentations slide show. I use the above features and the little known features of Elements to make presentations to my students. Thanks so much.
- Keith Johnsen A Pixel dash review of the poster creation program from Adobe. It's worth a look at this software tool as its basic design is still being refined. There is still a lot more to do in terms of functionality and usability but its raw utility for creating Web2.0-style posters is there. The Imaginarium toolset is also very useful if you're going to be working on a poster for the web, made in Photoshop. Elements even comes with some useful desktop plugins, like the ScreenGrab plugin, which allow you to take a screenshot and turn it into a digital illustration. There are also plenty of plug-ins that come with Photoshop Elements and Photoshop itself that provide more extended functionality if you want to try some more complex techniques. You can find tutorials for Elements on the Adobe website as well.
