Upgrade to Lightroom 5
– New Import Settings
The new Import dialog has been made easier to use. You can now set a number of parameters such as whether to keep Lightroom's embedded previews, save images for offline viewing, and more. The Import dialog remembers your changes between sessions, so you'll never miss a picture. Better color sampling
In the revamped Adjustment Panel you can now explore, expand, and spot-adjust individual color channels directly in the panel. Each color sample spot has a range of options, many of which allow you to drag as you work, and slide based on the current editing recipe. Often sampling colors requires that you step away from your keyboard to explore a panel. Now you won't lose any productivity time, as you can make color adjustments while others watch, listen, or work. Advanced power
With new controls and a completely redesigned interface, the rulers, guides, and various other measuring tools also handle up to 16-bit floating point precision. This change can be difficult to bear, as it essentially means that Photoshop won't do any consistent pixel-based conversions. Instead, all units are preserved as relative to the image, so that the edit can be applied consistently between documents. The default bracketing mode in Adobe Camera Raw (ACR) is to create a new layer that, when selected, triggers gain and exposure compensation settings for that layer. Generally, this works well. However, if a layer is applied quickly on top of an image, the bracketed settings may be applied on top of that layer, rather than on the original layer. So, if you're switching between applications quickly and accidentally wipe out a layer you've been working on, you might not notice and lose the bracketed exposure settings.

Darkroom is a brand-new "Blending & Revealing" feature in Photoshop. This new feature allows you to process RAW files from a variety of cameras - including the Nikon D750 DSLR, and the newer Zeiss medium format system cameras (unfortunately, it doesn't support Polaroid cameras). Darkroom features a wide-gamut display panel, which enables greater color accuracy when viewing JPEG images. Adobe's High Dynamic Range (HDR) editing comes to Photoshop with the new Wash tool. You can now use Hue/Saturation to adjust the washed-out (Hue -90°) or overly light (Hue +90°) effect. A new "Rich Tones" filter mask is also available for this feature. There are a number of new effects in Photoshop that are only possible with the use of a GPU. The new Stutura and Master filters are pattern-based effects that can create some truly unique looks. With the new Wash tool, you can easily fine-tune the exposed tone from fully saturated to very desaturated. This allows you to use a toning filter to move towards or away from a white or black point. You can also use the new filter to add color look-up table (LUT) images to create a wide variety of tonal colour corrections such as black & white contrast, sepia, orange, magenta, green, blue, yellow, cyan, red or green-to-blue.
